To Whom It May Concern:

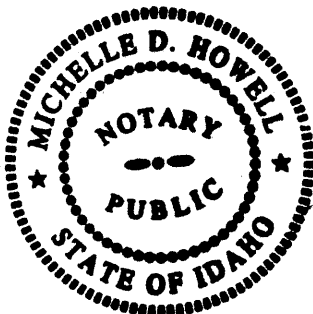

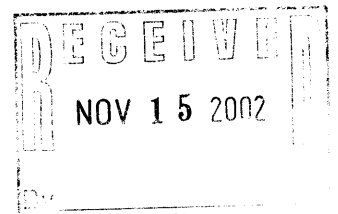

I, Lynn Bullock, moved to the property that is now 8455 Marsh Creek Rd with my family in March 1926. I am 77 years old and have lived here for 76 years.

When we moved here the Rowe family had been here for 46 years. My oldest brother, Ed, worked for them. When they lost the property to the Federal Land Bank, Ed leased the land for 2 years before the Bischoffs bought it. Ed lived in the old Rowe home that was on what is now the Smith property. Ed used the irrigation ditches dug by the Rowes to water his garden and grain and hay fields. The first ditch across the road connected to ditches west of the orchard to move water from Rowe Creek [now Cottonwood Creek] and a ditch northwest of the house to move the water down by the house and through the field south of the house to ditches going to the northern fields and in case of flooding, to Marsh Creek. The second ditch that crossed the road is on Murray's property and is the high point of the old ranch. The ditch runs through what is now Wheatly's cattle lot. It was used to bring water from Rowe Creek [now Cottonwood Creek] to irrigate hay and grain crops. The water ran through ditches toward Marsh Creek but could be diverted to run north or south, where ever the water was needed. The third ditch across the road is on Worthylakes property. The ditches across the road were replaced with culverts when Marsh Creek Rd became a county road in 1948. The canyon and creek west of Murray's was known for years as Rowe canyon and Rowe creek.

When Bischoffs bought the property, they continued to use the existing irrigation ditches for their garden, hay and grain crops. They used the land from Worthylakes south for pasture.

Frank Lew also used the existing irrigation ditches to water his garden, potato and hay crops.
