REIGN PHILE TODAY

Colonel Holden, soldier and athlete, returns to England, the heart of his mind when war is declared with Holland. He comes to terms with Quin, hostess of the party's head, in Paul's Yard,

The school tells his old friend, the Duke of Alençate, to secure for him a place in the army, and Alençate warns him that the name of General Holles, father of the school, is on the warrant for the execution of the late king's favourite. It is dangerous for him to make a commission.

On the street, Holmes meets an old-time friend named Tucker, who tells him to listen to the faintest whispering of a street preacher who uses his voice to warn the people of the rapid spread of dreaded pestilence. Holmes goes to Tucker's rooms.

GO ON WITH THE STORY

Pecker's face set into grimaces and lines. An eloquent fellow, as some lines. "He should resign, that," he said. "He should resign, these silly sheep from their apathy."

The Colonel seemed to be surprised. There seemed to be an air of mystery about the words. "Can you not understand anything?" he asked without adding anything more. "I do not know," he said, and on.
