posed and copied by the Essenes, a small, strict Jewish sect. The Essenes apparently settled down at Qumran during the reign of a Jewish high priest and ruler called Hyrcanus I. That was between the year 135 B. C. and 104 B. C. What happened to them thereafter is still open to conjecture. One school of thought holds that in 31 B. C. after a severe earthquake (which did occur at that time) the Essenes decided they had received a command from God to go into exile, and so emigrated. This is a plausible theory since it is clear from archeological evidence that the site was unoccupied from just about this time to about 4 B. C., when it was rebuilt and reoccupied. In A. D. 68 or 69, however, during the first Jewish revolt, a strong Roman legion, ruthlessly restoring order, marched on Qumran. That was just a year before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. The Essenes hurriedly hid the scrolls in the only hiding places available to them — the nearby caves. Then they fled or were massacred. Their settlement was destroyed and the Romans either unaware of the scrolls or indifferent to them, left them in the caves to await the coming of a curious shepherd 1,900 years later and, after him, the scholars and the theologians of the modern world. — By Jan van Os in the Aramco World.
